CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS

Managing congressional investigations requires substantive experience with congressional rules and procedures, detailed knowledge of the subject of the inquiry, sensitivity to public and media relations, and a comprehensive understanding of the relationship of the investigation to the client's objectives.

Jones Day attorneys have represented both individual and corporate clients before Congress in a range of matters, relying on the Firm's broad experience in congressional, investigative, civil, and criminal proceedings. As required, our attorneys conduct internal investigations, draft testimony, prepare witnesses for often adversarial and confrontational hearings (in which the nature of the questioning differs from that of other forums), and interact with congressional committee members and staff to protect the interests of our clients while providing necessary information to Congress.

Jones Day lawyers with relevant experience include the former chief counsel and staff director of the House Ethics Committee, former senior executive-branch officials and counsel, and litigators with substantial experience representing witnesses before legislative committees.
